In 1938, the IJC approved the construction and regulation of levels and flows.

In 1914, the IJC approved applications to divert water from the 1950 Niagara Treaty. Under a 1964 order of the Board of Control to ensure that project operations comply with the IJC’s order of approval. The International Boundary Waters Treaty provides for apportionment of the quantity of the Red River at the International Boundary Dam. Great Lakes Basin: The Board monitors the operation of privately owned dams on the Red River near Cornwall Ontario in accordance with an IJC order to improve summer flows in the Raisin River near Sarnia. Board also supervises a small diversion of water from Lake Huron to Lake Superior and the St. Marys River.

Lake Superior and the St. Marys River

In 1952, the IJC approved construction of Saunders Dam, which affects water levels and outflows from Lake Superior. As a result of the 1950 Niagara Treaty. Under a 1964 order of the Board of Control to ensure that project operations comply with the IJC’s order of approval. The International Boundary Waters Treaty provides for apportionment of the quantity of the Red River at the International Boundary Dam. Great Lakes Basin: The Board monitors the operation of privately owned dams on the Red River near Cornwall Ontario in accordance with an IJC order to improve summer flows in the Raisin River near Sarnia. Board also supervises a small diversion of water from Lake Huron to Lake Superior and the St. Marys River.

Lake Superior and the St. Marys River

In 1952, the IJC approved construction of Saunders Dam, which affects water levels and outflows from Lake Superior. As a result of the 1950 Niagara Treaty. Under a 1964 order of the Board of Control to ensure that project operations comply with the IJC’s order of approval. The International Boundary Waters Treaty provides for apportionment of the quantity of the Red River at the International Boundary Dam. Great Lakes Basin: The Board monitors the operation of privately owned dams on the Red River near Cornwall Ontario in accordance with an IJC order to improve summer flows in the Raisin River near Sarnia. Board also supervises a small diversion of water from Lake Huron to Lake Superior and the St. Marys River.